About Conference :

Social science research in India has had a chequered history. There is a growing recognition of the importance of academic research in India and is being monitored by public institutions. Most of the trends and features of social science research have been conventional which are continued even in recent decades as well. But there have been both quantitative and qualitative changes that have given rise to new features some of which do not appear to auger well for the future of social science research in India. However the focus in these assessments has remained largely confined to quantity dimensions, completely ignoring the dimension of quality. There is wide disparity in research activity and output across the country, both in terms of quantity and quality. However, social science research in India has under come serious criticism in recent years for not having met expectations in terms of analyzing some basic structural aspects of the economy and society that have emerged, particularly in the wake of the India's quest for globalization, meeting some internationally set standards of quality and providing inputs for policy and teaching in higher education. Through this conference an attempt will be made to the quality of social science research.
